Freudian Dream Theory, Dream Bizarreness, and the Disguise-Censor Controversy

Simon Boag

One particular area of contention in discussions of Freudian dream theory and its relation to the neuroscientific evidence is the notion of "disguise-censorship" and its relation to dream bizarreness. The discussion to date, however, has neglected the conceptual basis of repression and disguise-censorship, and this paper aims to clarify the role of repression in dreaming and its contribution to dream bizarreness. An analysis of disguise-censorship and repression reveals two competing accounts in Freud's theory. Freud's account of the "dream-censor", acting as an agency intentionally disguising cognitive content, is found to be problematic. However, Freud's alternative account of repression, in terms of cognitive inhibition instigated by motivational conflict, is developed and discussed in relation to neural inhibition. On this view, dream bizarreness arises, in part, through interdrive competition preventing direct expression of wishes and the subsequent formation of substitute aims. Resolution of certain contradictions and inconsistencies between the neurological evidence and Freudian dream theory is discussed.

One area where Freud's theory is still actively debated is in the area of dream theory and its relation to the neuroscientific evidence. Although much of the dispute to date has concerned the relation of rapid eye-movement (REM) sleep and dreaming (see Hobson, 1999; McCarley, 1998; Solms, 1999, 2000a, 2000b), a key unresolved area of contention concerns "disguise-censorship". Disguise-censorship is generally considered by those critical of Freud to be "the heart of Freudian dream theory" (Hobson, 1999, p. 170; cf. Hobson, 1988; Hobson & Pace-Schott, 1999). On this view, "the psychic censor acts to screen and block wishes unacceptable to consciousness" (McCarley & Hobson, 1977, p. 1218; cf. Donhoff, 2004, p. 11), and here it is claimed there is not "the faintest modicum of support" (Hobson, 1999, p. 157). Given this supposed centrality, these authors believe that if disguise-censorship is false then Freudian dream theory as a whole can be rejected.

After all is said and done, disguise-censorship is closer to the heart of the Freud-Solms dream model than wish-fulfillment... The problem... is that if disguise-censorship is explicitly renounced... there is really nothing left to the Freudian dream theory.

[Hobson & Pace-Schott, 1999, pp. 211-212]

Part of the dispute here arises in connection with explaining the bizarre characteristics of dreams. According to those critical of Freud, dreams are "bizarre because of the loss of the organizing capacity of the brain, not because of an
